"What street was it where you found the baby?"

"I don't remember."

"Well, this unnamable street, wis it east or west of Ninth avenue, and was it built up or not?? Was the house on the north or south side of the street?

What kind of a house was it? Did it stand flush with the street or back in the lot? Was it a new or an old house? Did it have a fence or not? Was there a stoop or not?"

Mr. Salter said he thought it was west of Ninth avenue; had a vacant lot near it; stood back in the lot, and was two stories high.

Baby, its dainty face haloed in the frill of a white bonnet, squirmed out of the grasp of the female who held her, wriggled to the floor and pattered around to play with Annie's curls. Then it turned and gazed wonderingly up into the faces of the lawyers for the defense, her grandpapa Pollock, and then she scrutinized the face of each of the tweive jurgers in turn.

Not that I remember. I went back to my brother's office. He was the writer of the letter. I took to the women who had hie child. I reported to him their demand for money, $10 or $12. My brother, A. O. Salter, gave me the $10 or $12, and I returned the next day, got the child and delivered it to the mother."

Col. James got Mr. Salter to tell in detail all about how he got the child from the two women at the unknown house five or six blocks from One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, paying $10 or $18 to them and getting a receipt for it. Then he read from Salter's testimony in the divorce proceedings. In which he said he got the child in One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, and that it was brought from somewhere else.

"It was brought from somewhere else," blurted the witness, uneasily, "Mr. Pololock told me so." Pollock," interrupted Mr. Thain. "Mr. Alexander Pollock is on trial here."

She said that all she wanted was money, about $29 a week, or a sum that would earn that amount, for her to support and take care of herself and her children.
